We revisit long-held yet unfulfilled promises of intelligent transportation systems, in light of growing industry interest in traffic information and location-based services. Building on advances in online traffic forecasting methods, we propose a unified framework for anticipatory or predictive strategies for effective information provision as well as system management, including dynamic pricing. The potential effectiveness of these strategies is illustrated through simulated applications. We discuss challenges and prospects in light of evolving system connectivity.